Narrative Description

The Haywood County Farm and Cemetery is a former poorhouse and penal farm sited on 86.5 acres on the south side of US Highway 70 East at its juncture with Harrell Road, four miles east of Brownsville, Haywood County. The farm is composed of resources constructed primarily from 1925 to 1977, including the Superintendent's house, three jails, barn, implement barn, general barn, hog barn, dormitory, pole barn, smokehouse, and potato barn. A cemetery, established circa 1868, is also located on the property, in addition to a newly installed cemetery memorial. The architectural styles present on the farm are primarily that of the Late 19th & early 20th Century American Movement and the Modern Movement. Many of the extant buildings are associated with agriculture and are grouped on the north side of the property near the US Highway 70 East entrance, while the remaining land is still used for agricultural purposes as it was historically. The historic features and character of the jails and farm buildings remain. The property is surrounded primarily by agricultural fields and outbuildings, and single family, residential homes with some commercial infill.

INVENTORY

1. Superintendent's Residence (ca. 1935, ca. 1960) – Contributing Building

The Superintendent's Residence is an irregular plan, one-story, ranch building clad in brick veneer and capped by an asphalt-shingled hip and gable roof with knee brackets. Unless otherwise noted, all windows are original and consist of either wood, double hung, nine-over-one light or metal, double hung, two-over-two light windows. Wood windows are located on the original section of the house, metal windows on the addition. All windows are framed by brick sills.

The façade is located on the north elevation. A hipped roof porch supported by six brick columns separated by arches partially wraps the north and west elevation. A pair of wood windows are located on the east end of the façade. The porch shelters an entrance filled with a Craftsman-influenced, six-light, three-panel wood door and a pair of wood windows. [Photos 1 & 2]

The west elevation has three pairs of paired wood windows. A small crawlspace filled with a wood door is located directly beneath the northernmost pair of windows. The circa 1960 rectangular rear addition is visible from the west elevation and features a pair of two-over-two metal windows. [Photo 3]

The south (rear) elevation features a rear entrance filled with a nine-light, one-panel wood door accessed by two concrete steps. A brick patio the same width of the elevation is located around the steps, and a brick pathway leads away from the building. Two matching pairs of metal windows are located to the east of the rear entrance. [Photos 4 & 5]

The east elevation features two pairs of wood windows flanking a single wood window. An exterior, brick chimney is located on the circa 1960 addition on the southern end of the elevation. [Photo 5]

The interior living room has original wood floors, baseboard, and original hanging metal light fixture with painted walls. A pair of wood doors lead into the dining room [Photo 6]. Original hardwood floors, chair rail wood trim, and baseboard are all present in the dining room. The bottom one-third of the dining room wall is painted, and the top two-thirds are papered. There is a built-in wood china cabinet with glass doors in one corner [Photo 8]. Available information states that a "Mr. Miller and Mr. Crowder" built the china cabinet in 1936.¹ Photographs indicate that the kitchen floor was covered in replacement vinyl flooring. The bathroom has been modernized with tile and new fixtures; however, an old gas wall heater remains on one wall [Photo 9]. The den with brick chimney on the back of house was built by Ovid Lovelace, who was superintendent of the farm from 1958 - 1960s. The den has a brick fireplace and tile floor covered with rug [Photo 7].

The Superintendent's House is a Contributing resource because it was present during the Period of Significance, retains integrity, and directly contributed to the historical significance of the property. Constructed circa 1935, the house served as the residence for the farm superintendent and their families. The superintendent was responsible for the operation of the farm and supervision of the residents and prisoners on the property. This made the house the administrative center of the complex. The exterior changed with the construction of a 1960 addition on the south elevation. However, this change facilitated the continued use of the property for its intended purpose and does not detract from the resource's ability to communicate its historical significance. Interior changes outside the Period of Significance include the installation of vinyl flooring in kitchen and renovation of the bathroom. However, the interior continues to retain important materials, design, and workmanship, including the original hardwood floors, trim, and door surrounds, and its overall design and layout. As such, the Superintendent's House is a Contributing resource to the Haywood County Farm and Cemetery.

2. Old Jail (later Wood Shop) Building (1933) – Contributing Building

The Old Jail is a one-story rectangular building set upon a concrete foundation, supported by masonry load bearing walls, and capped with a flat, built-up roof. There are four major components of the building: the Old Jail constructed in 1933; a ca. 1950 brick garage addition attached to the rear of the Old Jail building; a ca. 1960 wood frame shed roof addition attached to the rear of the ca. 1950 brick garage; and a carport addition installed sometime between 2011-2018.

Unless otherwise noted, all windows on the building are wood, double hung, windows crowned by a brick segmental arch and sat upon a brick sill. The façade (north elevation) features a centered entrance filled with a six-panel vinyl replacement door flanked on either side by one-over-one light windows. The easternmost window retains its iron bars. The door is crowned by a brick segmental arch. A centered, semicircular pediment adorns the façade roofline. A single, rectangular recessed panel is located directly beneath the semicircular pediment [Photos 11 & 12]. Two six-over-six light windows adorn the east elevation of the original Old Jail building. Above and slightly off center of each window are two small rectangular recessed panels. An interior chimney is visible on the roofline [Photo 12].

The ca. 1950 brick, one-story rear garage addition is attached to the south elevation of the Old Jail building and is visible from its east elevation. An entrance filled with a metal garage door is present where the garage addition meets the original Old Jail building. A six-over-six light window is located south of the garage door [Photo 14].

The ca. 1960 wood frame addition runs the length of the garage addition's south elevation, with a sizeable portion extending beyond the garage addition's east elevation. It is sat upon a poured concrete foundation, covered in wood siding, and is capped by a metal shed roof. A one-over-one light, double hung, vinyl window is present on the west elevation of the addition. A six-panel vinyl door is located on the south (rear) elevation of the addition. Two six-panel vinyl doors are located on the north and east elevations of the addition's extended portion. These doors are sheltered by a 2011-2018 shed roof carport supported by a total of ten wood posts and capped with a metal roof. [Photos 12, 13, & 15]

The interior retains some jail cells with metal bars and the poured concrete floor is painted. The jail doors vary in operation and include both sliding and hinged doors, though some are missing. The ceiling is covered in plaster board, with some areas featuring exposed wood rafters. Walls are painted brick with some metal paneling covering the original brick. The room housed in the south addition is an office that is paneled in plywood and features a concrete floor. It is accessed by a replacement multi-light door with arched lintel. A wall furnace and AC unit is also located on one wall [Photos 17-19].

The Old Jail Building is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. The Old Jail Building was constructed in 1933 and housed the inmates incarcerated on the farm. The building was erected as a Civil Work Administration (CWA) project to provide sleeping quarters for more than forty prisoners. Quarters for guards were included. Though there is no documentation that states when it was converted to a woodshop, it is likely this occurred after the Haywood County Jail building was constructed in 1977. Former Superintendent Clinton Neal said the bathrooms and carport were added on the east side during his tenure as supervisor between 2011-2018.²

3. Asylum Building (1936) – Contributing Building

The Asylum is a one-story rectangular building set upon a concrete foundation, supported by masonry load bearing walls, and capped with a flat, built-up roof. Unless otherwise noted, all windows are wood, double hung, and rest on a brick sill. The facade (north elevation) has two one-over-one light windows flanked on either side by entrances filled with replacement wood doors. The entrances are crowned by a brick segmental arch. A centered, semicircular pediment adorns the façade roofline [Photo 23]. The east elevation has four windows crowned by a brick segmental arch spaced along the elevation. The northernmost window is two-over-two light, the remainder of the windows six-over-six [Photo 26]. The concrete foundation is visible on the south elevation [Photo 20]. Four small arched window openings are also visible, though they have been bricked in. The original iron bars can be seen in the westernmost window. Two interior brick chimneys are visible on the roofline. Four windows are located on the west elevation [Photo 21]. All of these windows retain their original iron bars except the northernmost window. Like the east elevation, the northernmost window is two-over-two light, the remainder of the windows six-over-six. Three rectangular air vents filled with the original iron vents are located between the windows and the roof line.

The interior has two cells with metal bunks attached to the interior wall. The walls and ceilings are covered with corrugated metal. Metal bars with a central hinged jail door separate the cells from the remainder of the space. The floors are covered in concrete and painted. Doors located on the interior walls are hinged and filled with 5-paneled wood doors [Photos 24-27].

The Asylum Building is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. Constructed in 1936, the current Asylum Building replaced an earlier poorhouse asylum constructed in 1884.³ The building housed patients returning from the Western State Mental Institution in Bolivar who provided labor for the farm and were an important part of its operation.⁴ The Asylum building retains important features of its material, design, and workmanship that would have been present during these important years, including the original jail cell walls and doors, barred windows, parapet, and overall design and layout.

² Clinton Neal, interview by Sharon Hayes, May 2024, Brownsville, Tennessee.

³ Emma Bond Ingram Nunn, ed., History of Haywood County, Tennessee, 1989 (Brownsville: Haywood County Historical Society, 1989). The original asylum was a 24 x 44 brick building constructed at a cost of $1700.

⁴ Guy Harrell's diary mentions drawing plans for a "new building near the jail" in 1935. A year later the building was completed, and the patients moved in. Harrell's journal mentions those who were transferred to the property during the move.

4. Barn (1933) – Contributing Building

The Barn is a rectangular, one story, wood frame, center aisle barn capped by a metal, gambrel roof. The center aisle portion rests on the ground, while the stalls flanking the center aisle on the east and west are sat upon a mixture of brick and poured concrete foundation. The barn is oriented on a north-south axis and the north elevation serves as the façade. The barn is accessed by a center aisle flanked on the east by a large rectangular opening and on the west by a smaller entrance filled with a single leaf wood door. The remains of a metal track for a sliding barn door are visible west of the main opening.

The north elevation is clad in horizontal wood siding, and the remaining elevations are covered with wood vertical board. A hay opening is centered directly above the north elevation entrance and has been filled in with vertical board. A window is located directly above the hay opening. The bottom portion of the window is filled with a single wood, four light sash, and the top sash is missing. It is likely that this opening housed a hay winch. The south elevation mimics the north one. There are no features on the east elevation. Three, wood, stationary, four light windows are interspersed along the west elevation.

The interior is divided into stalls constructed of rough-cut lumber. The center aisle exit is centered on the south elevation of the barn and is flanked on the west by a large, shed roof opening, likely used for equipment storage. A hay opening filled with a hinged frame door covered in vertical board is also centered above the south elevation entrance. A rectangular opening for a hay winch is visible directly beneath the peak of the roofline. Stalls for mules, cattle, horses are visible, and hay was stored in the loft & feeding troughs below [Photos 28-31].

The Barn is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. Constructed in 1933 as a Civil Works Administration project, the Barn housed livestock including mules, forage, and other equipment necessary to run the farm.

5. Implement Barn (ca. 1935) – Contributing Building

The implement barn is a rectangular, one story, wood frame pole barn capped by a metal gable roof and covered in corrugated metal siding. The façade faces east and features three open bays supported by four wood poles with braces covered in metal. Exposed rafter tails are also visible on the façade. The remainder of the elevations are enclosed with metal siding. The two northernmost bays are combined to form a large bay, which is separated from the southernmost bay by a wood wall covered in metal siding. It suffered storm damage sometime between 2005-2007 and the south end was never rebuilt [Photos 32-33].

The Implement Barn is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. Constructed ca. 1935, the Implement Barn housed the machinery used to work the land and crops grown on the farm.

6. Dormitory (ca. 1925) – Contributing Building

Haywood County Farm and Cemetery
Name of Property

Haywood County, TN
County and State

The dormitory is a rectangular, one story, wood frame, gable front building set on a brick foundation and capped by a metal gable roof. The façade (east elevation), north, and west elevations are covered in vertical wood board siding. Two, wood, six panel doors are located on the north end of the façade. A wood, double-hung, four-over-four light and a wood, double hung, two-over-one light window are located on the south end of the façade. A rectangular wood louvered vent is centered just below the gable peak. The south elevation is open and support by wood columns topped with metal triangles. Exposed rafter tails are also visible [Photos 34-36].

The Dormitory is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. Constructed during the 1920s, it was used for housing the poor house inmates and as the rest home. The Dormitory experienced changes ca. 2000 when the south elevation was opened to serve as an equipment shed. Despite the change, the overall form of the building and its relationship to other buildings in the complex remains intact.

7. Potato Barn (ca. 1960) – Non-Contributing Building

This barn is a square, one story, concrete block building set upon a concrete block foundation and capped with a front gable asphalt shingle roof. The façade faces east. The gable field is clad in wood. A single, centered wood door with six lights and a single panel is located on the façade. A shed roof awning covered in vinyl siding shelters the entrance. The remainder of the elevations have no architectural detail [Photo 37].

The Potato Barn is Non-Contributing because it does not date to the Period of Significance.

8. Pole Barn (2000, 2003) – Non-Contributing Building

This barn is a rectangular, single story, wood frame pole barn capped by a front gable metal roof with no foundation. The façade faces east and is open. Four wood poles with wood brackets support the façade. The sheltered space it creates is not divided and encompasses the entirety of the building's interior. The north and south elevations are covered in horizontal wood siding, and exposed wood rafter tails are visible on these elevations. The first story of the west elevation is covered in horizontal wood siding, and the second story is covered in metal siding. The lumber used on the sides of the building were salvaged from old bleachers from the former Carver High School gym.⁵ The addition attached to the west elevation was constructed in 2003 to use as stalls for rescued horses. It is covered in metal siding and capped by a metal gable roof with an open window frame on the west elevation [Photos 42-44].

The Pole Barn is Non-Contributing because it does not date to the Period of Significance.

9. General Barn (ca. 1930) – Contributing Building

The building is a rectangular, one-story, wood frame central aisle barn capped by a front gable metal roof and clad in vertical wood siding. The barn is oriented on a north-south axis, and the main entrance is located on the north elevation, which also serves as the façade. The entrance is a large rectangular opening that occupies most of the elevation. A covered space capped by a shed roof runs the length of the east elevation. The shed roof is supported by four wood posts with wood brackets. Exposed wood rafter tails are visible on the elevation. The south elevation is plain and has a single window opening below the gable [Photos 47-49].

The General Barn is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance. Constructed in 1930, the barn housed livestock like cows, and was also a storage building for corn and hay.

10. Hog Barn (ca. 1935) – Contributing Building

The Hog Barn is a rectangular building clad in wood weatherboard and capped by a metal shed roof. The east façade is open with wire doors on stalls. The south and north elevations have no windows or noticeable architectural features [Photos 45-46].

The Hog Barn is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance.

11. Carport (1998) – Non-Contributing Structure

Prefabricated carport supported by four metal poles with a metal gable roof.

The Carport is Non-Contributing because it does not date to the Period of Significance and does not contribute to the historical significance of the property.

12. Cold Storage Building (ca. 1935) – Contributing Building

The cold storage building is a rectangular, one-story, concrete block building capped by a gable asphalt shingle roof with incised porch and off-center entry located on the east elevation. The porch is supported by two wood posts and shelters a concrete landing. The east portion of the porch features a brick knee wall with two metal supports. The porch also shelters and entrance and enclosed window opening. Exposed rafter tails are visible along the roofline. There are no discernable architectural features present on the remainder of the elevation [Photos 39 & 41].

The Cold Storage Building is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance.

13. Storage Building (ca. 1935) – Contributing Building

Wood frame with metal gable roof and incised flat roof porch supported by two wood posts. A single metal replacement overhead door opens onto a small, poured concrete pad on the east elevation. The north elevation has a fixed, four light window and a boarded opening in the rear. The rear west elevation has a wood door, and the south elevation also has a fixed four-light window [Photos 40- 41].

The Storage Building is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance.

14. Smoke House (ca. 1935) – Contributing Building

The smoke house is a rectangular, one-story, wood frame building capped by a front gable asphalt shingled roof, sat upon a brick foundation, and clad in wood weatherboard siding. A single entrance filled with a vertical wood board door is centered on the west elevation, which also serves as the façade. Exposed wood rafter tails are visible on the north and south elevation [Photo 10].

The Smoke House is Contributing because it dates to the Period of Significance, contributes to the historical significance of the property, and retains integrity to communicate that significance.

15. Haywood County Farm Cemetery (ca. 1868) – Contributing Site

The Haywood County Farm Cemetery is approximately three acres of land sited upon a prominent hilltop on the western end of the site. This graveyard was established at the same time as the farm. According to the Haywood County Court Minutes, the first burial was also in 1868.⁶ Both black and white poor farm inmates and county paupers are buried in the cemetery.⁷ There are no markers left to identify individual graves. By local accounts, the field stone markers were removed over time, likely by the 1970s, to accommodate farming activities, making it difficult to identify burial dates and names. Research has identified 48 death certificates that specifically mention burial in the Pauper cemetery, though estimates place the actual number of burials to potentially be in the hundreds. As efforts to identify those buried there and the extent of the cemetery continue, more information about those buried there will come to light [Photo 50-52].

The Haywood County Farm Cemetery is Contributing because it dates of the Period of Significance and contributes to the historical significance of the property. The cemetery has experienced significant changes, including the removal of markers to make it easier for mowing and maintenance. This has negatively affected the cemetery's integrity of materials. However, these changes align with broader treatment of poorhouse, poor farm, and insane asylum burial grounds. The final resting place of these marginalized groups were afforded little protection and consideration. The absence of markers and repurposing of the burial sites was a common occurrence in other places in Tennessee, like the institute located at Clover Bottom in Donelson and the Central State Hospital cemetery in Nashville (now partially occupied by an airport). Though the cemetery's markers were removed, its location on a hill away from the complex does communicate the spatial relationship between poorhouse and asylum inmates and their dead. Because the site strongly retains integrity of location, setting, feeling, and association, it is considered contributing to the overall district.

16. Haywood County Jail (1977, ca. 1998) – Non-Contributing Building

The building is an irregular plan, one-story, concrete block building with brick veneer walls with a poured concrete foundation and capped with a flat, built-up roof with a partial metal panel cornice. The façade (east elevation) projects from the main part of the building. The main entrance is filled with a double leaf entry with full sidelights and transom. There are four, fixed, one-over-one light windows with transoms flanking either side of the main entrance. In addition, there are two square windows with three horizontal metal bars and a solid metal entry to the far right. Metal paneling runs across on the parapet wall. The set back wall behind it is brick veneer with no decoration.

⁶ April 4th, 1868, Haywood County Court Minute Book "I," pages 537-538.

⁷ The county paid a local funeral parlor to cover the costs of county pauper burials in the cemetery.

The south elevation has the metal paneling across a projecting area of parapet wall. Below it is a receiving dock and two metal doors. The remainder of the wall has five square windows with five metal bars set horizontally. The parapet wall is flush with no decoration.

The west elevation has the brick veneer wall and a concrete block walkway to the annex on the west end. The north elevation has several projecting blocks accessed by metal slab doors with one window, square windows with three horizontal metal bars, and metal paneling applied to the parapet wall.

The facility was designed to hold eighty inmates. All the interior walls are painted concrete block. The floors are painted poured concrete unless otherwise noted. The public room ceilings feature dropped acoustical tile and the cells and dining room ceiling are painted concrete. The foyer has vinyl tile on the floor and at the end opposite the entry, and the main office has a glass reception window with a microphone. A flat metal door to the left leads to the interior of the building. The main office has the control board for jail operations and a dropped ceiling, and built-in metal desktop for use of personnel. The jail-side south corridor has cells with metal bars separated by concrete walls. The typical cell has four built-in bunk beds attached to the wall, and two-tiered metal benches that would allow for writing, etc. There is a toilet area at the rear. The booking room has a concrete floor, painted concrete block walls, and a dropped acoustical ceiling. The dining room on the south end has five windows with horizontal metal bars and built-in concrete picnic tables. The ceiling has rectangular light fixtures.

The date of the brick veneer and annex on the west side of the building dates to circa 1998. It is attached by an enclosed walkway and the gable roof is metal. The annex is also brick veneer with slit windows at the ceiling level. The interior walls are painted concrete block, the floors are painted concrete, and the dropped ceiling has rectangular light fixtures. The annex was also known as the East-West Barracks, which contained two large spaces divided by a center wall to separate pre-trial detainees and prisoners serving sentences. Each side could hold about forty inmates. After prisoners moved to the new Justice Center in 2011, this vacated space was converted to the Haywood County Archives to centralize and preserve county records, with facility upgrades including new wiring, lighting, and HVAC (to improve environmental controls), and shut-off sprinklers (not suitable for archives). Before then, old records had been stored at the county Quonset building on North Washington and in various rental storage spaces [Photos 53-62, interior photos 63-68, the annex interior is 69-70].

The Haywood County Jail is Non-Contributing because it was constructed outside of the Period of Significance.

17. Haywood County Farm Cemetery Memorial Marker (2023) – Non-Contributing Object

The Haywood County Farm Cemetery Memorial Marker was erected to mark the Haywood County Farm Cemetery in 2023. The marker is an obelisk made of granite. It is sat upon a square concrete base, which itself rests on a concrete circle. Two concrete paths adjoin either side of the concrete circle and bend inward to meet again, creating a rough Q shape walkway to the marker. The old field stones have been retrieved from the vine-covered fencerow and returned to the cemetery grounds alongside the memorial monument.⁸ A panel marker listing the names of the known dead is being planned by the Haywood County Farm Committee [Photo 71].

18. Agricultural Land (1868) – Contributing Site

The Haywood County Farm and Cemetery’s 86.5 acreage is defined primarily by flat land with scattered, gentle rises. Intermittent stands of mature hardwood fields dot the fields. There is one remaining pond on the property located near the western property line in the south field; a previous livestock pond on the cemetery site located near the center of the northwestern field was filled in 2023. Nixon Creek runs through the property on a north-south orientation and feeds into the south field pond. Fields are divided internally by barbed-wire fences and are accessed by basic, unpaved farm roads. The property is accessed by a paved concrete driveway south of US Highway 70. The driveway then splits to the east and west of the Superintendent’s house before rejoining behind the house (south) to form a rough O shape. A small, paved parking lot accesses the prison complex on the west side of the driveway. The southeast corner of the O shaped driveway provides access to the workshop before turning into a gravel drive that runs south roughly 265 additional feet, at which point it becomes a dirt farm road. This gravel drive accesses the complex’s southern outbuildings. The farm is bounded to the north by US Highway 70, to the west and south by a boundary fence and mature hardwood trees, and to the east by Harrell Road.

The Agricultural Land is categorized as a contributing site because of its central importance to the operation of the farm since its founding. Though it has evolved over time, this change is an important characteristic of farming landscapes and embodies the prevailing agricultural practices at that time.

INTEGRITY STATEMENT

The Haywood County Farm and Cemetery retains its integrity of location, setting, design, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association. The complex has remained in the same location since the initial purchase of acreage for the farm in 1868 by Haywood County. Its setting has changed some over time. Research indicates that the farm likely had around 200 acres at its maximum, which was then sold off over the years until it reached its current size of 86.5 acres. However, the retention of the superintendent’s residence, cemetery, and agricultural outbuildings and the acreage still in use by the farm allows the property to communicate its important history. Further, though there has been some commercial infill, the property remains surrounded by single-family residential homes and other rural fields, much as it did historically. As such, the property retains integrity of setting. The property also retains integrity of design, materials, and workmanship. Though several buildings experienced changes as the farm evolved over time, many occurred during the Period of Significance. The resources, when considered as a collective whole, further reinforce and communicate the property’s significance, thus lending the property integrity of feeling and association.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph

The Haywood County Farm and Cemetery is significant under Criterion A at the local level. The area of significance is social history. In 1868, Haywood County purchased a farm of 150 acres four miles east of Brownsville for the sum of $2,700 for a “Poor House.” An asylum was then added in 1884. Around 1915, the Poor House expanded to house prisoners, at which point the property became known as the Haywood County Work Farm. The elderly, mentally ill, and prisoners alike lived and worked on the farm until 1957, at which point it transitioned to housing only convicts. Their stories, captured in part by United States Census records and the diary of farm Superintendent Guy Harrell, conveys early concepts of caring for the rural indigent and southern prison reform in Haywood County. They also speak to the challenges and experiences of those who tilled the fields and operated the farm. The Period of Significance is 1868 to 1957. These years reflect the establishment of the farm and the first recorded burial in the cemetery and conclude with the year the farm starting housing only convicts.

Statement of Significance Summary

Context for Poorhouses and Poor Farms

Taking care of America’s poor, elderly, and mentally ill has been a major topic in United States politics and culture since the Colonial Period, and its evolution over time reflects changing national attitudes and opinions about these groups. Options for the poor and destitute during the Colonial period were restricted. It was the responsibility of the town, county, or parish to provide care, housing, and necessities for the poor. Some areas appointed an Overseer of the Poor, an individual who allocated a portion of tax money towards food, fuel, clothing, or medical attention to needy persons. Other options involved a system by which the poor were auctioned off by officials to the lowest bidder. During the auction, private individuals in the area placed a bid on how much it would cost them to house the poor. The lowest bidder won the contract and was expected to care for the pauper and their family in return for access to the pauper’s labor. This arrangement generally lasted for a year. A select few locations had official community organizations in place to take care of their poor, though this was not as common. Regardless of their options, care for the poor and needy in this early period was incredibly dependent upon local conditions, which naturally meant the quality of care varied widely.⁹

It was not until the second quarter of the nineteenth century that the need for a more comprehensive approach to caring for America’s poor became apparent. The number of people who needed assistance rose dramatically during the late 1800s. This increase was tied to several interconnected factors. Perhaps the biggest cause of increasing poverty was the rise of industrialization. Jobs previously performed by humans could now be completed more cheaply and efficiently by machinery. This eliminated important reliable employment opportunities for local workers. For example, rural workers who once counted on having a job during the threshing season found themselves replaced by threshing machines. A rise in immigration also created a surplus of workers who were competing for a limited number of jobs. Rampant sickness and workplace injuries likewise contributed to the number of poor and the needy across the nation.¹⁰

In response, individuals and both private/public organizations started the Poorhouse movement. Essentially, poorhouses were tax-supported residential institutions that would care for the poor, elderly, and/or mentally ill if the family or local community could not support them. People could be admitted to the poorhouse if it was determined they could be poor or needy long term. Indeed, some people were even admitted if they did not seek attendance. People convicted of begging could be sent to the poorhouse against their will.¹¹ Proponents of the system believed that poorhouses could solve the immediate problems of the poor and help cure the “bad habits” that led to being poor and destitute in the first place. Many poorhouses had strong religious ties and preached moralism, restraint, temperance, and the need for education.¹²

Despite the optimism of their founders, the poorhouse system ultimately failed in both of its objectives. By the middle of the nineteenth century, many had grown disillusioned with the movement. Poorhouses were generally unsanitary and subjected those who lived there to less than adequate living conditions. Public opinion also turned against the poorhouses when reform efforts seemed to yield no result. Though there are many reasons for the failure of the poorhouse, one of the main causes was the unwillingness of public officials to allocate enough money to make them successful. This was exacerbated when many states inherited the responsibility of running and maintaining poorhouses from private philanthropic groups in the late 1800s. Issues of adequate funding and inadequate facilities plagued the poorhouses until their dissolution at the end of the twentieth century.¹³

It is important to note that both poorhouses and poor farms frequently housed the mentally ill in addition to local paupers. Historian Michael Katz identified the first major state attempt at improving the lives of mentally ill paupers as the State Care Act of 1890 in New York. The act specified that the state would take on the care and expenses of the mentally ill. Prior to this, the mentally ill were housed at poorhouses or taken care of by family and community members. Normally a poorhouse or similar institution would have a separate department in place to take care of the mentally ill, though it was not uncommon for the populations of the poor and mentally ill to mingle in overcrowded poorhouses.¹⁴

Poorhouses were only one component of the movement to provide relief for paupers, the mentally ill, and elderly in America. Arising from the same movement was the poor farm. Poor farms housed the rural poor, in contrast to poorhouses that primarily served urban populations. The study of poor farms is often overlooked because it was lumped in with studies on poorhouses. Further complicating issues is that many referred to

The modern nursing home is identified by many as the spiritual successor of the poorhouse. The need to house those that family or community cannot or will not support shares much in common with the origin of the poorhouse. Further, the quality of care and financial issues that plague some senior living homes speak to the challenges facing poorhouses in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

buildings that residents lived in on poor farms as “almshouses” or “poorhouses.”¹⁵ The poor farm and poorhouse certainly shared some overlap. Both organizations sought to provide for the poor, mentally ill, and elderly. Both models also required residents to live on the premises to facilitate their rehabilitation through religious and moral programming. Finally, the administration of the poorhouse and poor farms relied heavily on the capacity of a single individual, leading to large variations in quality of said organizations even in the same state.¹⁶

However, where they differed was the poor farm’s emphasis on work, and the process by which a poor farm was established. Proponents of the poor farm argued that agricultural and outdoor labor improved the health of those on the farm and fostered a “sense of personal dignity, community, and home.” This same labor would also ideally offset operation costs.¹⁷ Thus, any resident on the farm was required to work if able, whether it be hard toiling in the fields or washing clothes indoors. Residents were also expected to construct any additional infrastructure or clear additional land needed for the farm. Many entrepreneurial farm directors lent the labor of their residents to other public and private projects to make additional money.¹⁸ Both the Haywood County Farm and National Register-listed Lincoln County Poor House Farm (NR Listed – 7/11/1985) document inmates working on county road projects, cleaning up after civic parades, or assisting private individuals with field clearance.¹⁹

Founding a poor farm followed a different process than poorhouses. Whereas the latter may have started with a philanthropic organization, poor farms were generally founded by county officials, though in some areas municipalities took the lead establishing farms. Either way, an official would approach a private individual and offer to either buy or rent land from them for the express purpose of establishing a poor farm. Once established, a Superintendent was then appointed by officials to oversee the operation of the farm and care for its residents. This position could be considered attractive for the independence and flexibility it offered the Superintendent, as there was no dedicated county, state, or national agency monitoring their activities.²⁰ It was a term-based, salaried position that also provided housing and food for the Superintendent and their family. The Superintendent could also make additional money if the farm was profitable in some counties.²¹ Though the prospect of additional money incentivized some Superintendents to efficiently manage their farms, it encouraged others to cut corners and operation costs to increase their profit, often to the detriment of their charges.²²

The requirements necessary to be admitted to a poor farm varied in many places, but the general procedure required a destitute person to present themselves before a regular session of the county court. The court would then review their case and material assets before either declaring them a pauper or stating that they did not meet the requirements. Some courts considered people a pauper if they owned less than ten dollars in worldly goods.²³ The exact date of this ten dollar rule case is unclear; however, if that case took place in 1913, the earliest year available for inflation calculation, it would amount to someone having less than $315 in 2024.²⁴ Once admitted, a pauper lost their ability to leave the farm, lost the right to vote, and surrendered all their money and property to the county. Many also shared the same property with prisoners convicted of petty crime, the elderly, orphaned children, and the mentally ill. It is no surprise that many county poor farms became a catch-all facility for any who relied upon the county to support them. It is also telling that some poor farms referred to all their residents, regardless of the reasons for their arrival on the farm, as “inmates.”²⁵

Poor farm complexes reflected the specific needs of the county, farm, and population. A book published by Alexander Johnson in 1911 titled The Almshouse: Construction and Management elaborated on the ideal poorhouse and poor farm. According to Johnson, a poorhouse should have separate housing for men and women, allow for an abundance of sunlight and fresh air, allow for quick and convenient access by administration, and be designed with the comfort and convenience of inmates in mind.²⁶ The Adams County Poor Asylum in Decatur, Indiana was provided as a good example of how a poorhouse should be laid out (See Figure 1). The front entrance accessed a central hall with parlors, libraries, kitchen, and dining room all located within the same hallway to either side. A door separated the entry hall from the remainder of the sprawling facility. Dining rooms and bedrooms were in wings on the first floor, and medical rooms and additional bedrooms were located on the second floor.²⁷ The ideal poor farm itself should be located in area easily accessible by the public, include choice land, be uncluttered, and factor in natural beauty to help with the rehabilitation of its charges.²⁸

According to Daley and Pittman Munke, the mentally ill were regulated to the poor farm “by default” because most counties did not possess the medical resources to adequately treat them. Children were also placed in county poor farms if a local orphanage or facility for children existed. Both populations were expected to contribute some form of labor to the farm.

The reality of poor farms differed wildly from Johnson’s recommendation. At a minimum, each poor farm had a Superintendent or caretaker’s house, housing for the poor, convict facilities for prisoners, secure facilities for the mentally ill, and the facilities necessary for supporting agriculture.²⁹ These facilities were often simple and built with financial efficiency, rather than inmate comfort, in mind. The dormitories present at the Haywood County Farm and the Lincoln County Poor House Farm (both located in Tennessee) were simple rectangular buildings with a few windows and shared spaces. Both complexes may have also been segregated by race and gender.³⁰ Many poor farms also did not have separate medical facilities for their inmates. Medical treatment was provided either by doctors on staff or local doctors willing to treat inmates.³¹ Despite not meeting some of the requirements put forth by Johnson, it should be noted that both the Haywood County Farm and Lincoln County Poor House Farm followed the recommendations for site location. Both are easily accessible by the public and are sited near a water source. The land is also good agricultural land.

Haywood County Poor Farm

Haywood County was formed from parts of Madison County in 1823-24. The new county was named for Tennessee judge and historian John Haywood. The Tennessee state legislature designated the city of Brownsville as the county seat in recognition of its cultural and economic importance in the area. Haywood County was later reduced in size when the neighboring counties of Lauderdale and Crockett counties were created in 1835 and 1871, respectively. Cotton was the foundation for the county's economy throughout much of its history. Early settlers established a plantation system that utilized enslaved labor to harvest the crop. After the Civil War, sharecroppers and tenant farmers formed the backbone of the labor force. The mechanization of agriculture and arrival of industrial opportunities after World War II finally unseated agriculture as the primary occupation in Haywood County.³² Nevertheless, agriculture continues to remain an important part of the county's economy.

The deed recording the establishment of the Haywood County Poor Farm was filed March 14, 1868. Joseph H. Morton sold three tracts of land containing a total of one hundred and fifty acres to the county for $2700. This transaction underscores the financial difficulties many counties faced when establishing a poor farm. The large costs associated with founding a farm made it difficult for some counties to afford. This made the growth, harvesting, and sale of profitable crops on the land a necessity to offset both the initial and continued operations costs. Though there were buildings and outbuildings constructed on the property after acquisition, the current farm did not start taking shape until the construction of the superintendent's residence, jail houses, and agricultural outbuildings in the 1930s, many of which were constructed by the Civil Works Administration.

Census data from 1900 and 1910 captures the evolution and changing population of the complex. In 1900, the "Asylum for the Poor" housed thirteen total residents, composed of nine African Americans and four white inmates with an average age of fifty-three. A child was also housed in the asylum. This number decreased in 1910 to nine inmates, with eight African Americans and only one white inmate with an average age of sixty-two. The superintendents at the time were Wilkes Moody and James E. Stewart, respectively. They and their families lived on the farm with the inmates.³³

The early years of the Haywood County Poor Farm coincided with an increased interest in humanitarian reforms across the United States, a movement that gained momentum at the turn of the twentieth century. Reformers exerted pressure on both federal and state governments to adopt reform agendas that advocated for better living conditions and outcomes for prison inmates. Some believed that implementing a farm system utilizing inmate labor would be more productive for both authorities and the inmates than previous models. Historian Jane Zimmerman summarized their agenda as follows:

Prison reformers who advocated special treatment for women, boys, old men, and the physically handicapped believed that these groups could be employed in lighter farm work. They also pointed to the advantages of the farm system from the standpoint of health and morals and talked a great deal about fresh air and sunshine. Finally, the proponents of prison farms used the argument that most of the convicts would return to farms on release, so that they were actually receiving training for their future work.³⁴

The Tennessee General Assembly approved legislation in 1915 that transferred administration of poor houses to the respective county's workhouse commissioners. Workhouse commissioners were elected by the county legislative body and were charged with the supervision and "control of the workhouse in all of its departments, the convicts, the appointment or selection of a superintendent of the workhouse, all necessary guards and other employees...and generally to regulate and control that department of the county's business."³⁵ The poor farm quickly transitioned to a new role as a workhouse for prisoners in Haywood County in the following years and also became known as the Haywood County Penal Farm. Later census records indicate that poor house inmates, the elderly, and the mentally ill continued to live on the farm and worked alongside the prisoners.

The years between 1920 and 1935 brought growth and change to the farm complex. Twenty-eight residents/inmates were recorded in the 1920 census, with fourteen "convicts" and fourteen poor residents. In contrast, the 1930 census broke down the composition of its thirty-five residents, which included twenty-three poor house residents, eight prisoners, and one guard.³⁶ Residents and inmates raised row crops, cotton, fruit trees, produce, potatoes, hogs, cattle, and chickens. A 1932 newspaper article in the Chattanooga Times stated that the Haywood County Penal Farm was known for its "profitability" and that the farm had acquired additional acreage to expand its operations.³⁷ The current smokehouse, barn, and superintendent's house were constructed with New Deal funding in the 1930s, largely bringing the farm to its current appearance.³⁸ This is further corroborated by a 1934 article in the Nashville Tennessean stating that a new, 26' x 50' fireproof brick building was completed on the farm as part of a Civil Works Administration (CWA) project. The project provided temporary work for unemployed construction workers and could provide sleeping quarters for forty prisoners.³⁹ A later 1935 diary entry recorded the county's decision to build a new "insane" asylum on the property. The construction process required several visits from county official to review plans and oversee construction.

Guy Harrell was appointed the new superintendent of the farm in 1935. A newspaper article published at the time of his hiring stated that Harrell was a young, well-regarded, award-winning cotton farmer and had a wife named Vera. Harrell kept a meticulous diary of his years as superintendent (1935-1948) on the Haywood County Penal Farm. The diary included information on crops planted, crop yields, livestock numbers, cash

It should be noted that the Progressive vision for reform rarely became reality. County workhouses and penal farms proliferated across Tennessee and the rest of the South. Many were inadequately funded, leading to conditions that were little better than those reformers campaigned against originally. Rather than serving as a way for inmates to engage in healthy physical activity and gain the needed skills for life after prison, penal farms instead became another county jail where inmates worked off fines they could not pay. sales, and even the number of eggs laid every morning. He also recorded the rhythm of life on the farm, including court trips, visits to the movies, supply purchases, and visitation at a friend's wake.

An entry from March 28, 1937, provides a look into the lives of those who resided in the poorhouse on the farm. The inmates of the poorhouse consisted of the elderly indigent, homeless paupers, and a few orphans who had been reared there and never left. Harrell recorded his affection for the poorhouse inmates in his diary and put on occasional events for them. On that day, he and others hid colored eggs around the farm, likely to celebrate Easter. He noted that the older inmates "enjoyed it very much." The poorhouse inmates also received new clothes and a full dinner, and Harrell carried the radio to the inmates so they could listen to music and programming.⁴⁰

Harrell also recorded meticulous notes on the prisoner population and their lives. The prisoner population fluctuated quite often during the 1930s, though the number of prisoners usually ranged from roughly nineteen to twenty-five in total. The diary also indicated that he supplemented the farm's inmate labor with prisoners from city and county jails serving short terms of ten months or less. Those who could not pay any fines were also brought to the farm to work off their debt. It should be noted that obtaining additional prisoner labor from outside the farm proved difficult. Judging from historic photographs and Harrell's diary entries, the majority of the poor farm residents were African American. Harrell and several other guards were responsible for overseeing the prisoners.⁴¹

Prisoners and inmates worked the land on the Haywood County Penal Farm and land rented from adjacent farms. They were responsible for slaughtering pigs, poultry, goats and cattle and processing and delivering meat. Prisoners planted and harvested both cash crops such as cotton, hay and other silage, wheat and corn and sweet potatoes. Other food stuffs produced for the self-sustaining farm including lima beans, squash, okra, collards, tomatoes, sorghum, Irish potatoes, watermelons. These food stuffs were canned or processed in a variety of ways. Hogs were slaughtered in the cold months of January and February. Prisoners processed the slaughtered hogs into cured hams, sausage, souse, lard, and bacon. Cooks used any extra meat from the slaughtered hogs to feed both poorhouse, asylum, and prison inmates. Flowers, trees, and other ornamentals were also cultivated. The Haywood County Farm loaned their prisoners to other institutions in the area. Penal farm inmates worked on county road projects, cleaned hospital yards, hauled coal to county buildings, and removed ash from county buildings. They even provided the manpower at civic functions such as picnics and parades.

Superintendent Harrell meticulously recorded all the deaths and burial activities during his tenure at the farm. He noted their names and occasionally the cause of death. The unnamed, unmarked cemetery was sited on the long ridge just to the west of the buildings. This graveyard, wherein both African American and White inmates were buried, is a smooth greensward today, so much so that one would never suspect that many individuals over several generations have their final rest here. Studies led by Debbie Sterbinsky (2010) and the Haywood County Farm Committee (2020-2021) identified approximate boundaries for the cemetery. Haywood Heritage enlisted Middle Tennessee State University for a Ground Penetrating Radar study in 2021. The County Commission formally authorized the eight-acre set-aside in 2021 and later approved $50,000 in funding for a memorial; the monument was erected in 2023. Long ignored or forgotten, penal farm cemeteries, from the very smallest county poor house cemetery to the very large state mental hospital cemeteries, do not result in many findings when searching for grave markers. Most often, inscribed permanent stone grave markers were not provided by the families of the deceased nor did poor house or state institution provide the permanent markers. Uncut marker stones were originally placed to mark the line of burials in Haywood County's cemetery but were later removed for ease of farming and mowing. The field stone markers have recently been retrieved from a fencerow near the burial grounds and returned to the memorial site.⁴²

The 1940 Census listed twenty prisoners, twenty-three inmates, one patient, two cooks, one keeper, the head guard, and the Harrell family, all residing on the "Haywood County Poor Farm and Prison Farm." The coming of World War II and the 1940s heralded hard times and a decrease in prisoner population on the farm. A diary entry in July of 1941 noted that both hogs and cattle price had decreased significantly, with cattle selling for roughly six cents a pound, and hogs selling as low as three-and-a-half cents a pound. Harrell ended the entry with hope for both peace and the return of high prices for agricultural products, neither of which occurred.⁴³ The prisoner population also harshly declined during the war. In 1942, Harrell recorded that only eight prisoners were held at the Haywood County Penal Farm. This was a decrease from twenty-five prisoners in 1935. By 1946, there were only two prisoners under Harrell's care.⁴⁴

Though it is not explicitly stated what prompted the decrease in prisoner population on the farm, Harrell's diary documented multiple deaths among the prisoners. An inmate named Mack Bond was brought to the farm in April of 1944. Harrell notes that Bond had lice on May 6th and that he stayed out of a commission meeting to treat him. However, three days later Bond had passed away and was buried in the cemetery on the farm, the cause of death never stated. From May to December of 1948, four inmates died on the farm. Tom Lake, aged forty-five, died on May 13th and was, uniquely, not buried on the penal farm. John Dixon grew sick while working on June 4th and died that same day. Harrell also recorded the death of Ike Wilson on June 21, Jeff (no last name) on July 23, and Kate Halliway on December 21st. Apart from Lake, all were buried in the Haywood County Penal Farm cemetery. The year 1948 marked more deaths on the farm than it had prisoners.⁴⁵

Mr. Harrell's last days during his tenure at the Farm were poignant but matter of fact: "Dec. 24, 1948. Had Santa for the old folks. Six eggs. Dec. 25, 1948. Old folks had a good dinner today. Dec. 27, 1948. Dec. 29, 1948. We moved today. We hated to leave the old folks that have been with us so long."⁴⁶ Thus ended Superintendent Guy Harrell's thirteen-year tenure of the Haywood Farm and Cemetery. His management skills were such that in March 1937, the institution was identified as a "worthwhile" poor house for the taxpayers of

Despite the best hopes of its supporters, the poor farm model had already started its decline before it even got started. Much like its poorhouse counterparts, the poor farm was critically underfunded and frequently mismanaged at the outset.⁴⁸ Fear of both organizations led many rural people to use the phrase “you are driving us to the poorhouse” to express exasperation at being overtaxed and/or overworked.⁴⁹ The introduction of the Social Security Act of 1935 deepened these existing fault lines and cast further doubt on the continued viability of the poor farm model. Social security and other financial programs founded by the New Deal provided some relief for the poor across the nation, thus reducing the total population of many poor farms. Those who remained generally tended to be the elderly, mentally ill, and of course any prisoner population housed on the property. The arrival of Medicare and Medicaid in 1965, which assisted with caring for the elderly and mentally ill, further reduced the number of people who resided on poor farms. Before the Social Security Act of 1935, the United States had 135,000 county or municipal poor farms. Thirty-five years later, the last of the poor farms had closed their doors.⁵⁰

However, the end of the poor farm did not always signal an end for the complex itself. Though the poor, elderly, and mentally ill were no longer cared for on the farm, the prisoner population remained. Many poor farms transitioned into penal farms. This was the case with the Haywood County Farm. In 1957, a new Haywood County Workhouse Commission of four men was elected, and Richard Hopkins was reelected as the superintendent of the penal farm. The new commission and superintendent drew up an agreement that only convict labor could be utilized on county-owned or rented state property. Those who still resided in the poor asylum were recommended for transfer to the nearby Western State Hospital (NR Listed – 6/25/1987) in Bolivar, Tennessee. The commissioners stated that this decision was made in the interests of “peace and harmony and at the same time promote the best financial interests of the county.” It is unknown how many patients and inmates were relocated in 1957.⁵¹

The Haywood County Farm gained national attention in the 1960s for its role in the Tent City Movement. The African American citizens of Fayette and Haywood Counties struggled for full voting rights during the 1950s. Though Blacks had the legal right to vote, white citizens imposed roadblocks to keep them from voting through intimidation and threats of violence. In response, African American leaders formed the Fayette County Civic and Welfare League and the Haywood County Civic and Welfare League. In June and July of 1959, these leagues held voter registration drives for African Americans to vote in the August Democratic primary. However, whites responded by blocking them from voting in the primary. This prompted African American leaders to file a legal suit against the local Democratic Party. On November 16, 1959, the U. S. Justice

Department filed a lawsuit in federal court against the county party's executive organization, the first voting-related action filed under the provisions of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1957.⁵²

In response, many African Americans were refused goods, services, and insurance, and some even lost employment and were denied access to financial credit. Local Black tenant farmers were also evicted from land they were living on in the middle of winter in 1960 as punishment. African American property owners allowed "Tent Cities" to be erected on their land to house the displaced tenant farmers. Reverend Maurice McCrackin and other civil rights activists drove to Haywood County in 1961 following the evictions of Black families in Fayette and Haywood Counties. In response, McCrackin was jailed at the Haywood County Penal Farm in 1962, where he engaged in a hunger strike that brought national attention to him, the farm, and the Tent City.⁵³ U.S. District Court Judge Robert Malcom McRae Jr. ruled on July 26, 1962, that landowners could not engage in any acts that prohibited the right of any person to vote or register to vote, including eviction. By the end of 1962, the Tent Cities were disbanded.⁵⁴

RECENT HISTORY

An April 1976 report by The Tennessee Department of Corrections identified the downtown Haywood County Jail as inadequate, ranking it 97th out of 103 jails in the state. In response, county officials awarded a $586,000 contract to Old Hickory Builders in Jackson, Tennessee to build a new jail at the Haywood Farm.⁵⁵ The facility was completed in May of 1977. It was a 13,000 square foot facility that could hold up to eighty male, female, and juvenile prisoners. It also featured two maximum security cells and two interrogation rooms.⁵⁶ This facility was enlarged in the 1990s with the construction of the East/West Barracks. The prisoners in this facility still participated in farm work and county projects but were not used for road building projects. Prisoners continue to work on county property to his day; however, food production was discontinued at the County Farm around 2020, and the farm acreage was rented out for row crops in 2022.

In 2000, the Haywood County jail at the farm was cited for building deficiencies by a state corrections inspector. The County Commission appointed a Jail Committee chaired by Commissioner Brad Bishop to study the issues and make recommendations. The committee recommended upgrades to the existing jail building but the County Commission ultimately voted on a new Justice Complex that would combine the court system in one complex. Security considerations at the historic courthouse factored into the decision. In 2010 the new Haywood County Justice Center, a 196-inmate facility, was built at 100 South Dupree Road in Brownsville on the site of an existing abandoned Walmart building. The prisoners and staff were transferred out of the old Haywood County Jail at the County farm in 2011.

Today the County Farm site retains 86.5 acres of the original acreage. Many of the buildings are currently used for shop space and county storage. The 1990s jail annex was upgraded for use as an archival repository. The superintendent's house is currently being rented, and the pastures have been converted and rented for row crops. The farm was also recently designated a Tennessee Century Farm and was approved for a historic marker by the Tennessee Historical Commission in February 2024. The research and work of Haywood Heritage and Haywood County Farm Committee members Marilyn Harrell Booth, Mary Jane Dezern, Sharon Hayes, Mary Ann Sharpe, Tom Skehan, and Tom Archer have been instrumental in preserving the farm and recognizing the cemetery. The Haywood Heritage Foundation and Haywood County Farm Committee desire the property to be placed on the National Register of Historic Places to give historic status to this rare resource and to serve as an interpretation center for its unique history. It is a very significant and prominent reminder of the responsibilities local governments faced when caring for the rural poor, and the challenges that faced those who resided and worked on the farms.
