

Through its community behavioral health provider network and substance abuse prevention coalitions, the Tennessee Department of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services employs dozens of individuals across the state. While these individuals serve in different capacities during normal times, the current COVID-19 pandemic is calling all of us to reach across our job descriptions, come together, and create solutions. Many of these individuals have experience getting people into substance abuse treatment, creating community-based recovery supports. Additionally, many are trained in suicide prevention and other topics relating to mental health.
