
Educator Licensure Policy 5.502

The Background:

For deaf, deaf-blind, or hard-of-hearing students, access to effective communication is critical to obtain the benefits of an education, including but not limited to further education, employment, and independent living. It is imperative that well-trained personnel provide this visual and/or tactile communication access. Certification and professional licensure make this possible. Currently in Tennessee, there is not licensure for educational interpreters as provided in surrounding states. Therefore, qualified interpreters are leaving Tennessee to seek employment in other states or the private sector, leaving our students at a loss for this critical service. In early 2015, a 19-member task force representing advocates from the deaf community, higher education, and the Department of Education convened to address this critical issue. Research from this group indicated that not only does Tennessee lack professional licensure for qualified educational interpreters, who must hold a bachelor's degree and national certification, but that many interpreters currently serving students have limited training which results in poor communication skills and limited access to general education curriculum for students.

This item sets forth the following criteria for licensure for educational interpreters. The following changes can be found on page 8 of the tracked changes version of the document:

- A minimum of a bachelor's degree and one of the following:
 - A current nationally recognized certification which includes a written examination related to ethics and practice; or
 - A passing score on the written portion of the Educational Interpreter Proficiency Assessment (EIPA) and a minimum score of 3.5 of the performance assessment of the EIPA.

The Fiscal Analysis Impact:
